

Why the End of the School Year Feels So Hard for Anxious Kids.

What School Counselors Should Know-and What Parents Can Do

DOES YOUR CHILD HAVE:

Physical Symptoms?

Frequent headaches, stomachaches, or other bodily complaints, especially when facing change or stress.

Sleep Disturbances?

Trouble falling asleep, nighttime anxiety, waking up frequently, or heightened clinginess around bedtime.

Behavioral Changes?

Increased irritability, defiance, meltdowns, or noticeable emotional outbursts during transitions or uncertain times.

Excessive Worrying?

Frequently asking anxious questions or repeatedly seeking reassurance about upcoming changes.

The underlying cause is often anxiety driven by change and unpredictability. School-year routines disappear, and summer introduces uncertainty—new people, new places, no clear structure.

4 TIPS TO HELP THEM

Validate Emotions

Calmly acknowledge your child's feelings without immediately trying to fix the problem.

Maintain Routines

secure during changes or transitions.

Encourage Bravery

Gently encourage your child to face anxious situations with your steady support and reassurance.

Keep predictable daily routines to help your child feel

Use Visual Schedules

Create visual schedules to clearly show daily activities and ease anxiety about upcoming events.
